to the subject, attributes to the use of bad fish most of the disease in the colony, though his opinion is not shared in by the majority of authorities. Indeed, there are practitioners who deny the fish theory altogether, and point for their support to the fact that leprosy flourishes in countries where fish is rarely eaten.

That the disease is hereditary no doubt seems to exist, and that it is contageous is generally admitted by medical practitioners tact with the secretion or suppurating sorts of the leper, or transmitted by the clothes, utensils, pipes, etc., containing these parasitical germs of the disease.

To touch a leprous person with a sore finger, use the same knife and fork, or to drink out of the same glass, may be the means of communicating the diease. But the same law holds good with teprosy as with other contagious distinctions and the same law contagions are same law contagions. eases, much depending on individual constitution. Impaired nutrition from insuffiive fish diet doubtless predisposes to the invasion of the bacilli, which, in a healthy, vigorous constitution, would find no admis-

While many instances may be pointed out here where mea lived with leprous wives without contracting the contagion, well authenticated cases are vouched for at the asylum in which the disease was com municated by playing on a flute previously used by a leper, steeping in a bed previously occupied by a leper, batting a leper fisherman's hook, etc There are two forms; namely, the arm thetic and the tubercular, but they are both the same specific disease. In the are nibetic the fingers or toes are first : ff-cted-altered ensibility, either a burning sensation or total insensitiveness from the minute perpheral nerves of the skin being affected. In the black races white patches occur on the skin, which are quite insensitive; blots then form on the fingers or toer, ulceration foltowing, and the joints drop off. In the tu-bercular form the first symptoms are noticed in the features—the forehead, face, eyebrows nose and lobes of the ears swell and become the seat of tubercles; the eyebrows and hair thin and fall off, the mucous membrane of the mouth and throat are affected, and the voice falls. Both forms often coexist to exhaustion. The consul has seen a man at jaw and forchead, the nose, eyes, tongue and cheek-bones having disappeared. He was only living because the vital organs had been unmercifully unimpaired. It has been his lot to witness much human misery and distress incident to war and contagious epidemics, but he has seen nothing, nor does he believe it possible for the mind to conceive the best and at the lowest rates.

Pigeons shot near the leper wards have been found with unmistakable symptoms of leprosy; mice have been caught in the leper wards, pre senting the usual characteristic symptoms of leprosy. Twelve pheasants sent to the resident surgeon for breeding purposes died in eight months, and the doctor states that he found clearly defined symptoms of leprosy.
